South Fletcher Bent (1872–1942) was an African American writer, journalist, and editor. He was a key figure in the African American press movement of the early 20th century, and is perhaps best known for his work at the Cleveland Call and Post, where he served as editor from 1909 until his death in 1942.

Tragedy struck the Cleveland community when Fletcher Bent was killed in a car crash in 1942. The accident occurred on what is now called Bent Street, named in honor of the late editor. The crash site is now marked by a plaque and a small memorial garden. It serves as a reminder of the sacrifices made by those who have contributed to the social and cultural fabric of the community.

The district of the street where Bent lived and worked is now known as the Bent District. It is home to a variety of businesses, including restaurants, shops, and cultural institutions. The Bent District is also a hub for local events and festivals, such as the annual Bent Street Festival, which celebrates the history and contributions of the African American community.

Despite the tragedy, Bent's legacy lives on in the community he served. His work continues to inspire and influence the community, and his memory is honored through various initiatives, including the Fletcher Bent Community Center, which provides resources and support for local residents.

The events and history of the Bent District are captured in this article, which highlights the contributions of the African American community to Cleveland and the wider world.
